What's New in Version 2.0.9: - Corrected bug fixes - Windows version improved - Bug fixes See larger Screenshots below..The relationship between the voltage-gated sodium channels (Na V) and the cardiac action potential is central to the understanding of electrical events in cardiac and neural cells. It is well established that Na V is responsible for the rapid component of the delayed rectifier K+ current (IK) and that a reduction or absence of IK results in human and canine long QT syndrome (LQTS). The relationship between Na V and IK is reflected in two opposing hypotheses for the ion selectivity and pharmacology of Na V: "multichannel" theory proposes that Na V is permeable to both Na+ and K+ and contains more than one conduction pathway, whereas "channel-segment" theory proposes that Na V is selective for Na+ and that IK has a discrete structure composed of small channels all open and all having identical permeation characteristics. We recently used a new experimental approach based on restriction of Na V expression to a specific region of the heart and heterologous expression of Na V to test the channel-segment theory. While Na V was able to conduct Na+ under physiologic conditions, it was strongly blocked by the cardiac Na V channel blocker tetrodotoxin (TTX) and nifedipine. Reverse transcription- polymerase chain reaction and in situ hybridization studies from our laboratory indicated that Na V mRNA was specifically and exclusively localized in the SA node but not in the AV node or the right and left ventricular myocardium. These results are compatible with "channel-segment" theory. In addition, transient expression of a constitutively active Na V in combination with a quaternary ammonium ionophore (QLN452) in our model further supported the channel-segment hypothesis. Despite the progress in channel selectivity studies of Na V, the relationship between the structure and function of Na V is not clear. The present project proposes to address this question by

I'm wondering if you need a university degree to be a politician. A: In the USA, virtually all US citizens (including current and former state and federal legislators) are required to have a law degree (at the time of writing, 15 years legal experience is sufficient for the other two) as a condition of running for office. However, there are also local party organizations and individuals who organize various events in local elections (e.g., charity, "student vote" organized by local party leader, etc.) that don't require a law degree. See for the current US political party system. In many other countries, it varies. A: Politics is a highly specialized and highly competitive field. For the people who really want to get into politics, it is almost mandatory to have a degree in a specialized field. There is an enormous amount of work and training required just to get into the field. For those who do succeed in getting into the field, the other requirements are many, and quite challenging. A: In the United States, it depends on the individual legislator. The rule is either 16 years of legal experience or a law degree. Awesome! I made my toddler girls into princesses. They were kinda excited, and told
