Microsoft® DirectX™ Feature List - Windows® 7 Beta.Q: Typecasting a variable to int using C/C++ Can someone please tell me why we need typecasting in C/C++ if we have an int variable declared as such: int i = (int)&(sizeof(int)); I was told that the line of code returns the size of an int. However, when I tried the same code in my code, the value of i does not change. Why is this? A: Because in your example, the typecasting doesn't do anything to the size_t variable. The typecasting is only used when there's a size_t variable but you need to give it a different type. For example, to convert char * to int: char *str = "this is a test string!"; int i = (int)&str; Another example is to convert from a pointer of a smaller type to a pointer of a bigger type. For example, to convert int * to double *: int i = 3; double *d = &i; double *double_pointer = static_cast(d); Those aren't the only such examples, but they are the cases that I know of. A: Can someone please tell me why we need typecasting in C/C++ if we have an int variable declared as such: int i = (int)&(sizeof(int)); No, it doesn't. That is a type cast. In your example, the type cast only happens to remove a layer of indirection. (The sizeof(int) is removed from the pointer and the cast calculates the size of a pointer to int.) You typecast the number of bytes (size_t) to int because you want to access the value of the pointer. If the value of the pointer is an int 3da54e8ca3
