The danger was not in a single course of conduct; the danger was the continued, almost insidious, "moral and psychological domination of women in a highly intimate and sexual situation." As the first two counts dealt with this danger, we cannot say the district judge erred in not instructing the jury to acquit. The government offered other evidence which showed the threat of possible sexual assault. The first two counts of the indictment included the "ever-present danger" of sexual assault, and the district judge did instruct that the jury could not convict appellant if the alleged victim's fear of sexual assault was unreasonable. We have held that a similar instruction was proper where the victim's fear was caused by excessive force employed by the
