SCP: Blackout is a 2D puzzle adventure game designed as an educational tool. The player is guided throughout the game by Lana, a child who accompanies her friend Marco. The game utilizes primarily point and click navigation, and includes a few puzzle elements. At the beginning of the game, the player is given a singular goal: build a water purification system capable of creating clean water for Lana's grandfather. Throughout the game, the player will be required to solve many multi-part puzzles, which will lead them to multiple unique solutions. Players will navigate through a sandbox-style landscape, in which the player can freely move about, explore the game world, encounter a variety of unique objects, and eventually complete the game's singular goal. The game features an engaging story and will be directed at players with all levels of skill. In the year 2181, nine years after the E.D.N.I.S.A. (Environmental Disaster and Natural Incidents Simulation Automation) program, humans have almost entirely left Earth. On a small rescue station orbiting the sun, scientist and engineer Hunter Mooney is excited to learn that the mission to find water for her grandfather has been successful. Unfortunately, the return of her family is cut short when a sandstorm sends her plummeting towards the desert below. Barely escaping, she continues on, only to run into her friend and co-worker, Marco, who has crashed his dune buggy into a cemetery. As the two work together to repair the buggy and face the mission in front of them, they must go on without help from any outside sources. While they make their way through the desert, they encounter a few survivors from the beginning of the apocalypse, and meet another child named Lana. Together they slowly make their way to a city called New Atlantis, which is said to have water. However, the journey will be filled with challenges and obstacles, including the risk of getting caught by roaming bands of survivors, a gigantic spaceship that has crashed into a nearby mountain, and a bounty hunter in a speedboat.
