
tried to do this on my AMD 7790 card, the only limit being that I am able to get it to work on Windows only. I have enabled the CPU cache in AMD-APP, and have tried both Direct3D and OpenGL. I have tried varying the buffer size (as well as tried to keep the number of vertices constant, in order to limit it to just a few megabytes per draw call), but always the value gets reported as 0. I can only assume that the larger the number of vertices in the buffer, the more likely it is that the buffer gets cached, because when I try to use the memory in the cache directly (specifically, when I assign to a pointer variable in the code), I get a segmentation fault. I also tried the alternative technique of using a double buffer (one which is used in place of the VBO), but I found that the performance was worse than using a buffer which is larger than the VBO. I know that double buffering is a performance issue for the card I am using, so I tried to avoid that if possible. I am using the D3D11 API to access the card, and the D3D11_SB_UAV VBO feature, but I am also able to try the newer OpenGL API. I am targeting the 7790, which according to an official ATI source is an APU, but I am not sure about that. I am using Windows 7 64 bit. A: For GPG2V to work you need to use the following OpenGL extension GL_APIC as stated in the Appendix 2.1 which GPG2V assumes to be available: d0c515b9f4
