Planned by Kano and Takashi Hirano, Instruments was created to be less erratic and chaotic than the previous games. Their main abilities are to measure and determine the damage of the opponent. They are not standard character skills, rather a means to an end, the end being victory. The gameplay of this game is similar to that of its predecessor, Ultra Endurance. The game is played on a four-lane closed track in which the player can cause traffic jams by pushing trucks into the opponent's lane. The champion can only drive vehicles and its only goal is to pass the opponent's vehicles. If the champion stays in the lead for the entire game, the player wins the title and must face the boss. After passing the opponent's vehicles and reaching the finish line, the player moves onto the next track in which the leading champion must repeat the process. If the champion loses, a new leader is generated, and gameplay continues in this manner until the end of the game. When playing this game, the player's only control option is to make the opponent lose. The player can take over the cars or trucks of their opponent when they are close enough and the player can also drive close to the opponent to destroy their vehicles. The game also takes place in real-time and the player can choose to play with either AI settings (Random or Custom) or with the player's choice of AI selection (Easy, Normal, Hard, or Very Hard). The difficulty of this game can be adjusted at any time by the player. The player can take over the opponent's cars or trucks to
