of breakthrough pain in patients with cancer. Palepolid, a synthetic 4-piperidinopyrrolidine prodrug of methylnaltrexone, is a new alternative for management of breakthrough cancer pain (CTA). This phase II, dose escalation, multicenter study investigated the efficacy, safety, and pharmacokinetics of palepolid for relief of breakthrough pain in patients with cancer. Patients with an established diagnosis of malignant tumor were treated with intravenous palepolid 0.75, 1.5, or 3.0 mg/d. Efficacy was assessed using a brief pain intensity scale and consumption of breakthrough opioid analgesics. Side effects, adverse events, and palepolid plasma concentrations were monitored. A total of 103 patients were included in the intent-to-treat population. The 0.75-mg/d dose was ineffective and was therefore excluded from further analysis. The 1.5-mg/d dose showed adequate response of breakthrough pain; the 0.75-mg/d dose produced no benefit over placebo. The mean placebo-adjusted reductions (90% confidence interval) for breakthrough analgesic use at days 2 and 3 were 39% (14%-63
