a study was performed on the nonlinear buckling characteristics of a cantilever beam with a negative residual modulus of elasticity and a uniform surface crack. a method of finding the distribution of the maximum stress in the area of nonlinear buckling using a combination of the residual modulus of elasticity and the crack length was developed. the critical crack length was found in the range of 0.31–0.65 of the beam height. a study was conducted on the nonlinear buckling characteristics of a cantilever beam with a uniform surface crack in the range of 0.15 of the beam height. a method of finding the distribution of the maximum stress in the area of nonlinear buckling was developed. the critical crack length was found in the range of 0.36–0.65 of the beam height. an aircraft wing is one of the most challenging structures to inspect for damage. this report describes some of the nondestructive inspection (ndi) methods that are commonly used to search for cracks and other surface flaws. the methods include x-ray, infrared thermography, ultrasound, and eddy current. the effects of mechanical stresses on the components and their cracking behavior are discussed, and some of the ways these stresses can be measured are presented. the goal of this study is application of the briefly above-described inverse problem to the crack detection for structure. a wide list of publications on the structural crack detection can be found in reference [3]. however, crack in the first stage of its growth is very difficult to detect even for simple structures such as a beam. success in crack detection of structures depends strongly on the model of cracked structure used as for solving the inverse problem. in this study, the dynamic stiffness model of structures [4, 5] is conducted for cracked frame by using the equivalent spring model of crack [6, 7] and, then, used for identification of crack parameters (cracks position and depth) usually called crack detection problem. the problem of crack detection based on hereby constructed dynamic stiffness model of cracked frame structure and natural frequencies obtained from modal testing is formulated and solved using nonlinear programming method. numerical results are given to illustrate the developed theory. 5ec8ef588b
