The report, commissioned by the retailer, shows that it would take an astonishing £20 billion of total annual savings to match the carbon reduction impact of Waitrose's non-food business. The findings will come as a relief to shoppers after much of the media coverage of Waitrose's major ad campaign last year focused on the retailer's sustainability efforts. But while Waitrose has made the shift in thinking outlined in the report, the retailer is unlikely to divulge any information about its progress in cutting food waste. The retailer's adverts last year aimed to prove that the nation's supermarkets could not be trusted on the environment. The campaign featured British actor Douglas Hodge in his role as a green grocer who, despite his best efforts, is forced to close down shop when a nationwide rainstorm hits. The report stated that Waitrose is making good progress in tackling the impact of food production and distribution, and claimed that in 12 months around 2.5 million tons of food was wasted in the UK - the equivalent of 3.4 million 'births'. 'Waiting' by Michelin-starred chef, Heston Blumenthal, is one of the most popular ads in the campaign. He stars in a cooking show where he shares a traditional meal with a family in a British village, calling upon Waitrose to throw away two bags of food that were left in the supermarket because of a mistake. Waitrose boss, Andy Bond, said the figures were "disappointing and surprising". "This report shows that if we could increase the efficiency of our food distribution, imagine how much more food we could produce," he said. "What we don't produce is half the problem." In recent years, Waitrose has been attempting to bring a number of sustainability initiatives to the public.
